Create one week's worth of tweets and schedule them at different times during the day. The easiest way to start becoming known for the thing you do (aka 'becoming an authority in your field') is by simply answering questions people outside your industry often ask inside of a tweet. Example: "You probably don't need 20% down to buy your first house but you still need closing costs. Ask me for more details. #RealEstateTips". Or "I'm excited that 2 of my fitness students are running the Boston Marathon again this year. If you're training for a marathon, call me for help getting ready for it #FitnessCoach". Or "@StagingSally chose two of my paintings to brighten up this new office space #Paintings #Art #OfficeStaging"

[Tidbit: Notice the period in front of the @ sign in the last tweet. If you start a tweet with an @, only people following you and the people following the person mentioned will see the tweet. Twitter said they fixed this, but my experience says different.]

Name of 3 accounts that are either in the same niche as you or in a complementary business. Basically, accounts that would have followers that would want to follow you as well. Example: if you're a fitness trainer, an account that talks about healthy meals would be complementary. If you're a real estate agent, an interior designer or stager or lender would be complementary.
